Irregular War, Local Community
and Intimate Violence in Spain (1939-1952)

Jorge Marco and Mercedes Yusta Rodrigo

“No category of human beings are more cruel than a threatened ruling class, which feels itself on historical, economic and cultural grounds to be a natural “elite”, and which finds itself challenged by an inchoate mass which will no longer recognize its privileges.”

In contrast to other European countries, where armed antifascist resistance was a direct result of military occupation by a foreign power, the political violence experienced in Spain, until at least the mid-1950s was a continuation of the violence set in motion by the military coup of July 1936 and the ensuing bloody civil war. On the one side, the dictatorship continued its ferocious repression throughout the following decade with the active participation of a certain proportion of the population. Meanwhile, on the other side, some of the defeated did not lay down their arms after 1st April 1939 but organized themselves politically and militarily, particularly in the countryside, to continue the resistance against Francoism. The continued presence of this movement was used by the dictatorship to justify both tougher repressive legislation and the policies of repression and control of the population. Thus, the anti-Francoist guerrilla movement emerged as a result of the prolongation of the armed conflict and, to a large extent, reproduced the violence of the war.

---

This factor differentiates the Spanish anti-Francoist movement from other European antifascist resistance movements, which arose during WWII in response to invasion by foreign occupying forces. This would explain how resistance movements such as those in Italy and Yugoslavia were able to mobilize so much more of the population than occurred in Spain. However, the resistance in Spain was irrevocably linked to the European conflict. The evolution of the war in Europe was decisive in the development of the conflict within Spain. Furthermore, a significant number of the guerrillas fighting in Spain had previous combat experience with the French Resistance, particularly those groups sent to Spain by the Spanish Communist Party (PCE). This had important consequences for the development of the anti-Francoist guerrilla forces and the violence in which they were involved. Nevertheless, the armed strategy of the PCE was different when compared with the rest of the communist parties in the 1940s. The PCF in France and the PCI in Italy followed the instructions of Stalin to the letter, disarming the maquisards and partigiani after the end of World War II. On the contrary, the KKE in Greece and the PCY in Yugoslavia contradicted these instructions by carrying out a revolutionary war. The insistence of the PCE on the armed struggle in Spain in the 1940s had nothing to do with a revolutionary commitment, but with the survival of a fascist dictatorship after the end of the Second World War.

---

3 Marco, The Long Nocturnal March, pp. 181-184

The aim of the present study is to analyse the violence relating to the armed anti-Francoist resistance in Spain, considering it as a continuation of the conflict which began in 1936. With this in mind, we believe that the violence experienced in the countryside, specifically that involved in the repression of the armed resistance movement and its support networks, followed the pattern of the war, especially in the facet of “intimate violence”. An important hypothesis of this study involves the decisive role of the “primary” groups (family members, neighbours and friends) in the development of violence linked to the resistance, both in the structure of the resistance movement and in the repressive policies of the dictatorship. However, our focus on the importance of community networks based on kinship, the neighbourhood and friendship does not imply the depoliticization of anti-Francoist resistance. On the contrary, the present study emphasizes the fact that primary groups were key vectors for politicization and that Francoism, well aware of this, violently attacked them. Paradoxically, this policy of repression served to further politicize these groups by criminalizing entire families or groups without distinguishing individual responsibilities. Consequently, the analysis of post-war resistance and the resulting violence requires consideration of the two dimensions, political and personal, which shaped both the reasoning behind the violence and the groups against whom it was directed.

1. Wartime and post-war violence: “brutalization”, repression and resistance

---

While there has recently been an increase in the number of studies of political violence in post-war Spain, most either ignore the anti-Francoist guerrilla movement or pay it little attention. The violence is thus analysed exclusively on the basis of it being unidirectional Francoist repression, which tends to mask important reasons, dynamics and interactions. One of the most noteworthy is the formation of the anti-Francoist resistance movement as a result of the “brutalization” of social relationships during the war and post-war. In the present study we consider that the level of “brutalization” attained by the repression in certain rural zones of Spain cannot be understood without the inclusion of the armed resistance factor in the analysis of the post-war political violence.

It must be remembered that July 1936 was not when a civil war started in Spain, but rather it was when a coup d’etat took place, with a clearly defined plan for mass violence. Once the coup had failed and the war had started, the violent Francoist coalition designed and implemented a program of political cleansing against “internal enemies”, which continued during the post-war. Political violence had been inherent in the construction of the Francoist state from the moment of the coup in 1936: in the words of Pablo Gil Vico, “the suppression and social control of the enemy were the essential and inescapable aims of the New State”. Historians specialising in this period also point to a relationship between the social conflict of the Second Republic and the violence which took place in the areas captured by the Francoists. This relationship continued into the post-war period in some provinces of Andalusia such as Córdoba or in eastern Aragón, areas where there was later significant guerrilla activity. The class aspect of Francoist repression is also important as this was often directed at specific social sectors, such as farm labourers, who had posed a threat to the social order during the Republic.

---

Although the violence during and after the war was part of the same process of repression, from 1st April 1939 it was increasingly implemented through institutional channels. The imposition of new legislative and bureaucratic mechanisms tended to generalize the process of repression and social control via a structure of tribunals and police forces. Thus, the defeated were trapped in a complex network of repressive bodies responsible for a large number of accusations at a local level. The Francoist dictatorship was characterized by its “structural policy of repression”. The aim was to first paralyze the “internal enemy” and then implement a policy of cleansing which would strip it of its identity and political intention. To achieve this, it was vital to involve a part of the population: “the terror accompanying the Francoist “new order” was not (...) an alien construct to be imposed on the population, but an instrument of domination whose efficacy was only possible with the cooperation of some of its citizens”.

---

12 Prada Rodríguez, La España masacrada, p. 359; Cenarro A. Muerte y subordinación en la España franquista: El imperio de la violencia como base del "nuevo estado". Historia Social 1998; 30 the collaboration of ordinary citizens, thousands of the defeated were sent to concentration camps, prisons or punishment battalions. Between the end of 1939 and the beginning of 1940 it is estimated that around one million of the defeated were treated in this way. However, the prolonged internment of so many created enormous social unrest. Official reports show how the dictatorship began to fear a popular uprising in conjunction with the anti-Francoist guerrilla groups, particularly when the Allies began to gain the upper hand in WWII. As a result, the dictatorship substantially reduced the number of people imprisoned. From this moment on, the mechanisms of social control were largely transferred from the prisons and concentration camps to the towns and cities.

The local area was ideal for surveillance of the population, “especially in rural areas where people have close relationships and everyone knows one another”. Thus, “the atmosphere in small communities changed dramatically as they became cruel, inhospitable places where there was no place for any sign of left-wing or republican leanings”. The formation of the “Juntas Locales de Libertad Vigilada” (Local Parole Monitoring Boards) in 1943 signalled a new phase of the institutionalization of social control by the victors over the defeated, on giving the prominent people of each area the power to monitor the movements of anyone on parole. By closely involving sectors of the population in the tasks of repression and social control, the dictatorship was laying the foundations for their support and loyalty while, at the same time, causing “a deep

---

15 Prada Rodríguez, La España masacrada, p. 363

16 Rodríguez Barreira, Migas con miedo, p. 51.
fracture in society which largely explains the nature of the post-war violence and its “intimacy” at local level.\textsuperscript{17}

The birth of the armed resistance movement against the dictatorship is directly related to the dimensions and cruelty of the repression during and after the war. It had its origins in those who, having suffered reprisals at the hands of the Francoists, had hidden in the mountains and formed the first nuclei of resistance. After the war, communities (particularly in rural areas) were broken and bitterly divided into victors and defeated. In areas controlled by the Republican government during the war, such as parts of Andalusia and Aragón, the trauma of the revolutionary violence caused the eventual victors to become heavily involved in the repression of the defeated. Former Republican soldiers, on returning to their towns and villages from the prisons and concentration camps, were stigmatized, shunned and constantly harassed by their neighbours and the local authorities.\textsuperscript{18} These formed the nucleus of those who went into hiding immediately after the war and who would later collaborate with the guerrillas or become one themselves. As shown by Peter Anderson in his study of the town of Pozoblanco (Córdoba), most of those who had fled, and their contacts, had suffered persecution at the hands of the military courts.\textsuperscript{19} This was the typical biography of an anti-Francoist guerrilla in Spain. However, the consequences went beyond the individual and eventually impregnated the family and local networks of each guerrilla.

\textsuperscript{17} Gómez Bravo and Marco, \textit{La obra del miedo}, pp. 293-313.
\textsuperscript{19} Anderson, \textit{The Francoist Military Trials}, pp. 141-144
2. Local community: networks of family, friends and neighbours.

The brothers José and Belisario Lavín Cobo were two of the many who fled to the mountains during the war to escape Francoist violence.²⁰ In August 1937, following the occupation of Santander by Francoist troops, they sought refuge in the mountains, along with other companions from the Republican Army and some of their neighbours. The small group spent months of little activity in order not to attract attention from the soldiers. However, the calm came to an abrupt end in Spring 1938 when they were ambushed by a paramilitary Falangist group led by the local mayor, Manuel Casar. The operation resulted in the death of one of the fugitives and the arrest of Belisario, who, months later, was sentenced to death by a military tribunal and shot. The Falangist Manuel Casar, former neighbour and friend of the Lavín Cobo brothers, thus became the primary target of José Lavín. Only one month later José avenged his brother’s death by shooting Casar four times and killing him. However, this was not the end of the violence as Norberto Casar, Manuel’s brother, who was also a Falangist and former friend of José, was seeking revenge. In February 1940, almost a year after the end of the war, Norberto and José met in the mountains. Norberto had been watching José’s mother for months until, one afternoon, she unwittingly led him to his hideout. According to witnesses, they first shared a cigarette. Norberto then produced a revolver but it jammed as he tried to fire it. At this point, José pulled out his own pistol but Norberto managed to get away. However, after a short chase, he caught and killed him. Official reports on the case stated that José Lavín had “planned to exterminate the dead man’s family”.²¹

²⁰ The story of José and Belisario Lavín Cobo is recounted in: Andrés Gómez, V. Del mito a la historia. Guerrilleros, maquis y huidos en los montes de Cantabria. Santander: Universidad de Cantabria, 2008, pp. 42-78
²¹ Ibid., p. 88
For decades the historiography has interpreted this type of incident exclusively as a political conflict between Falangists and anti-Francoist guerrillas without considering the anthropological dimension to the violence. The case of the Lavín brothers illustrates the part played by key elements such as kinship, neighbourhood and friendship (known as primary groups in anthropology) both in the formation of guerrilla groups and in the dynamics of the violence initiated during the war and prolonged during the post-war period. The analysis of these components does not depoliticize the actions of the guerrillas, nor the Francoist repression or the dynamics of the violence. On the contrary, recent studies have shown over the years that networks based on family, neighbours and friends had a crucial role in the politicization of rural Spanish society during the 1930s and 1940s. Furthermore, analysis of these elements throws light on some aspects which are often hidden by strictly ideological or class-based interpretations, particularly with regard to violence.

In the heart of rural communities the conflict involving the guerrillas had unmistakeably local overtones. As James C. Scott noted with regard to conflict in agricultural communities: “one cannot talk about class relations and conflicts in such a community without recognizing that class relations are profoundly inflected by deep personal histories that have shaped them”. Javier Ugarte, in his local study on the political organization of a community in Navarra during the civil war, observed that “it was not ideas nor individual choice that gave shape to the group (...) but, rather, personal ties which implied specific interests, quarrels, sometimes within the family, friendships, patronage, etc. which initially shaped the groups”. In the same way, the violence connected with the guerrillas cannot always be explained by political or class affinities.

---

The primary groups played a vital part in the mobilization and structure of the guerrilla movement in Spain. Although their relevance can be seen throughout the latter’s development, their impact was greatest in the early post-war years. Between 1939 and 1942 dozens of armed groups organized themselves in the mountains of Spain after fleeing Francoist repression. However, these groups were enormously heterogeneous ideologically (socialists, anarchists, communists, republicans, etc.) compared to those of later years, in which ideology was crucial to their formation. In the early years, as shown by the case of José Lavín, the most important elements in the formation of the groups were kinship, neighbourhood and friendship. These first guerrillas were not united by their belonging to the same political organization but by the primary networks of socialization and their persecution by the Francoist dictatorship. Consequently, these first groups consisted of brothers, fathers and sons, cousins, neighbours from the village, companions from units of the Republican Army, etc.

These groups, which we have termed “local guerrillas” or “neighbours in arms”, had a special relationship with the local community. Most, or all, of their members were part of the community through birth and/or residence. More importantly, they limited their radius of action to the village or area to which their members belonged. The close links between the guerrillas and the local community were crucial for all aspects of the

---

25 Yusta Rodrigo, M. La guerra de los vencidos. El maquis en el Maestrazgo turolense, 1940-1950. Zaragoza: Instituto Fernando el Católico, 2005, pp. 95-110; Marco, Guerrilleros and Neighbours in Arms, pp. 5-9 movement, including the dynamics of violence and counter-insurgency, as will be discussed later. However, this model came under threat from 1944 onwards when the PCE leadership decided to send political officials to Spain to attempt to form these nuclei of resistance into “a real irregular army” of national reach. The intention was to combat the “localist” tendencies of the peasant guerrillas, following the classical marxist guidelines of the early 20th century.

The real influence of the PCE varied from region to region but there was cohabitation in all of them, often difficult, between the communists sent from exile in France and the local guerrillas. Although both shared the idea of anti-fascism they had radically different opinions as to how to fight against Franco’s dictatorship. The former believed it necessary to increase the influence of the PCE within the armed groups, to follow the instructions of their leadership to the letter and to give a clear political orientation (i.e. communist) to guerrilla activity, which, in some cases, such as the Agrupación Guerrillera de Levante y Aragón (Guerrilla Association of the Levant and Aragón) (AGLA), was conceived as the armed wing of the clandestine political organization. The latter were fighting, to a large extent, for their own survival and understood the fight in a local context. Their objectives had names and addresses and they often acted out of a desire for revenge (e.g. for the murder of family members).

The anti-Francoist guerrilla movement became inextricably embedded in rural communities through contact with the population, particularly through the “neighbours in arms” or “local guerrillas”. Family groups were often the first to be recruited by the guerrillas to form part of their network of contacts and collaborators. As Ana Cabana has pointed out, go-between networks were based on family, neighbourhood and friendship, plus political affinity, humanitarian feelings and economic interest. Consequently, these families became involved in the resistance movement and in activities considered subversive, thus exposing themselves to the possibility of repression. On the other hand, due to their close contact with the population, the guerrillas often mediated in disputes within the community. These often had their origins in the civil war but sometimes dated from long before and were often related to typical rural issues, such as land use and ownership.

---

27 Marco, Guerrilleros and Neighbours in Arms, p. 98.

The studies carried out at local level in eastern Andalusia or in the provinces of Teruel, Cuenca and Castellón, on which our analysis is based, show that interpersonal relationships involving family, friendship, patronage or neighbours are equally as significant as ideological affinities when examining the meaning and aims of violence, particularly that of the guerrillas, while the violence of the Francoist State tended to be more indiscriminate.

3. Guerrillas and the use of violence

The use of violence by the anti-Francoist resistance was noticeably lower than in similar movements in the rest of Europe due to three main factors: 1) the strong links between the anti-Francoist guerrillas and the local community where they were active generally tended to inhibit the use of violence; 2) the development of their activities

28 Cabana, La derrota de lo épico, pp. 195-221
29 Yusta Rodrigo, Guerrilla y resistencia campesina, pp. 45-62 took place in the post-war period rather than in the context of a war of occupation; 3) the lack of a final phase of liberation and victory, which, in other countries, led to a sharp increase in violence.

In terms of physical elimination, anti-Francoist guerrillas killed 953 civilians between 1939 and 1952.30 During the four years of the Nazi occupation of Greece (1941-1944), a country with a population four times smaller than that of Spain, guerrillas killed around 15,000 civilians.31 Comparison of the two figures clearly shows the low levels of physical violence employed by the anti-Francoist guerrillas. Another characteristic of anti-Francoist violence was that it was generally selective, which was not always the case in other parts of Europe.32 The selective nature of the anti-Francoist violence was due to the great number of local guerrillas and their close ties to the local community. The low use of violence and the fact that all participants knew each other obviously did not favour the use of indiscriminate violence.

However, there was some regional variation in both the intensity and the nature of the guerrilla violence. The provinces with the highest levels of killings were Asturias (148), Málaga (82), Coruña (75), León (75), Orense (74) and Granada (73), where both local groups of various ideologies and groups directed by the PCE were active. However, in the areas where the AGLA, the group most closely linked to the PCE and with the most guerrilla fighters were active, the levels of violence were lower: Teruel (43), Cuenca (35), Castellón (16), Valencia (15), Tarragona (3).33 There are two fundamental reasons that explain these regional variations. In the first place, the AGLA began its armed 31 Kalyvas, The Logic of Violence in Civil War, p. 249.

32 An extensive analysis of the selective and indiscriminate nature of the violence in Greece: Kalyvas, The Logic of Violence in Civil War, pp. 246-329.
33 Aguado Sánchez, El maquis en España, pp. 253-254.
activity at the end of 1944, while in the other regions armed activity began in 1939. Secondly, the AGLA was characterized as a predominantly political rather than military guerrilla group due to its close liaison with the Central Committee of the PCE in exile, in contrast to the rest of the guerrilla groups, whose political isolation reinforced the military sphere over politics.

This region had a long history of social and political struggle, particularly in the Maestrazgo mountains between the provinces of Teruel and Castellón. The tradition of peasant guerrillas here dates back to at least the 1830s and the legitimist uprisings known as the Carlist Wars. During the Second Republic, these areas were the scene of insurrectional movements, especially the south of Teruel and the provinces of Castellón and Valencia while, during the civil war, the Maestrazgo was in the hands of the republicans for a long period. It was thus possible to implement revolutionary processes such as the collectivization of land, which, in some areas, was accompanied by high levels of violence. The arrival of the Francoist army and the end of the war reversed the direction of the repression, which was intensified by the desire for vengeance on the part of some of those who had previously suffered reprisals. The memory of the violence suffered by each side profoundly affected the violence of the post-war period: to a large extent, the violence involving the anti-Francoist resistance can be seen as both a reflection and a continuation of the violence experienced during the war.

La AGLA was created by the PCE leadership in France, from where it sent armed groups to Spain at the end of 1944. They found a society which was only superficially

---

34 Rújula, P. Contraarrevolución. Realismo y carlismo en Aragón y el Maestrazgo, 1820-1840. Zaragoza, Prensas Universitarias de Zaragoza, 2011.

35 An initial total estimate of the number of victims of repression (Francoist and republican) during the war and post-war in Julia, S. Víctimas de la guerra civil. Barcelona: Crítica, 2001. A more recent account: Espinosa, Violencia roja y azul, pp. 77-78, 247 pacified, in which a sector of the population had experienced, or were still experiencing, Francoist repression.\textsuperscript{36} Although the vast majority of the Spanish rural population avoided any political engagement,\textsuperscript{37} a significant number of peasants committed themselves to helping the armed movement and some, particularly those who had held positions of responsibility during the Republic and the war or had been imprisoned for their activities during the war (which were often the same) joined the guerrilla groups.\textsuperscript{38} However, in addition to political affinities, personal ties also played an important part in the creation of these networks. Fathers and sons, brothers, neighbours and relatives became involved together in the guerrilla support networks or even joined the resistance groups.\textsuperscript{39} Many women also participated in the networks of contacts and support in this way, although this did not mean that they had no previous ideological commitment. This was noted by the forces of repression, who were already applying the principle of family responsibility in cases of repression connected with wartime activities.

The orders from the PCE leadership in exile in France clearly specified what should be the objectives of the guerrilla struggle, centred on the AGLA, calling for “(...) the execution of any magistrate sentencing a patriot to death (...) followed by the execution of any Falangist leaders responsible for the wave of crime and terror. This should be carried out by guerrillas but any Spaniard with a pistol or knife can and must do the same”.\textsuperscript{40} However, the reality of the territory in which the AGLA were operating was much more complicated than a simple division between Falangist executioners and anti-Francoist patriots. Furthermore, the guerrillas tended to base themselves in sparsely populated mountainous areas, far from political or industrial centres, which made the task of striking specific targets even more difficult. Nonetheless, the communist leadership saw the AGLA as an armed vanguard which could be used to attack the regime hierarchy and even Franco himself.\textsuperscript{41} However, the arrest of the AGLA leadership in Valencia between January and March 1947 forced the guerrillas to retreat into the mountains and put paid to the idea of combining the mountain bases with urban guerrilla activity. After this point guerrilla activities would be almost entirely confined to the mountains and opportunities to damage the regime’s infrastructure were limited to the sabotage of small electrical substations and to the railways. The violence of the guerrillas consequently became ever more localist and intrapersonal, tending to revolve around settling scores with the local authorities, individuals involved in repression and people who had informed on the guerrillas or their support network.

\textsuperscript{36} On 1st February 1943, the prison population accused of “marxist rebellion” totalled 104,286. Source: Anuario Estadistico 1944-1945. On the other hand, in September 1946 the communist newspaper Mundo Obrero gave a figure of 223,503 prisoners released on probation

\textsuperscript{38} The biographies of many guerrillas of the AGLA are found in Sánchez Cervelló J. (ed) Maquis: el puño que golpeó al franquismo. La Agrupación Guerrillera de Levante y Aragón. Barcelona: Flor de Viento Ediciones, 2003, pp. 432-489.

\textsuperscript{39} There are many examples: the brothers Vicente Zafón de Mosqueruela, Isidro and Francisco Serrano Iranzo de Castellote, Florencio Guillén father and son from Gúdar are among the best-known.

Guerrilla violence was also directed at the group itself, almost from the moment of the group’s inception. The creation of the AGLA and the establishment of the leadership in Valencia was accompanied by a restructuring of the pre-existing armed groups that was probably not to the liking of all the guerrillas. Some of the tensions were swiftly dealt with by eliminating dissatisfied members accused of being “agents provocateurs”.

\textsuperscript{40} Carta abierta de la Delegación del Comité Central a los miembros del partido, simpatizantes y a todos los antifranquistas en general”, \textit{Nuestra Bandera. Revista de orientación política, económica y cultural}, January 1945, p. 10.

\textsuperscript{41} The AGLA leadership had planned to carry out acts in Valencia during Franco’s visit to the city in spring 1947. “Informe del Comandante en jefe de la AGL del 18 de enero de 1947”. Military Trial 371-V-47. Fondo de Justicia Militar, TMT nº 1. Archivo Histórico de Defensa (AHD),
In some cases, such as that of José Ramiá Ciprés, nicknamed “Petrol”, and assassinated in December 1946 on the order of the leadership, these members were affiliated to the anarchists. 42 Other internal executions were a result of the paranoia affecting the leadership with regard to possible police infiltration, exacerbated by the fall of the communist leadership in Madrid in November 1946 and encouraged by the party leadership in France who had made “the fight against agents provocateurs” one of their priorities. Orders regarding the fight against “provocateurs”, especially in the case of newly-recruited members, were a constant feature of the correspondence between Vicente Galarza “Andrés”, the leader of the AGL in Valencia and the guerrilla leaders. 43 Juan Ramón Delicado, the leader of one of the guerrilla groups which had entered from France and who had a wealth of experience as an official in the French Forces of the Interior (FFI) was a victim of these internal purges. After being arrested by the police, tortured, and then released, his guerrilla companions were suspicious of his release and eventually assassinated him in the mountains on 17th November 1946 on the orders of one of the section heads of the AGL. 44

The dual political and personal logic directing the violence carried out by the anti-Francoist resistance can be observed from the very first acts performed by armed groups in the zone. Their targets were individuals connected with repression at local level or local regime members, reported to the group by the inhabitants of the zone. 45 This way

42 ‘Informe del camarada Ibáñez sobre Agrupación Guerrillera de Levante’, 14 July 1947, Archivo Histórico del Comité Central del Partido Comunista de España (AHCCPCE), Movimiento Guerrillero, jacquet 3, p. 10; El bandolero Petrol ajusticiado. El guerrillero 1947, 3
45 The first two assassinations attributed to guerrillas in Teruel of which we have knowledge were those of Balbina Puerto, wife of the mayor of Cañada de Benatanduz, in August 1945 and Manuel García Monforte, local Falange of thinking became even more accentuated and the guerrillas often mediated in quarrels and disputes. It must be remembered that political and social relationships were extremely endogamous and these were usually very small communities. Consequently, a political assassination (e.g. that of a Francoist mayor) would lead to personal animosity and a desire for vengeance. Thus, as well as fulfilling their role in political resistance they often meted out a type of “popular justice”. Furthermore, the actions of the guerrillas would often trigger violent reactions from the forces of repression leading to “spirals of violence”, of which the majority of victims were civilians. As the repression spread like oil over the community it became the main source of violence experienced by the population in the guerrilla zones.

The village of Gúdar (Teruel), with 437 inhabitants in 1944, is an extreme example of the nature of “intimate violence” in which political conflict, personal networks and state repression combine to tragic effect. On 28th September 1946 Felisa Montolio, the wife of the guerrilla Florencio Guillén “Pinchol” was arrested. The next day she was found dead in her cell. According to the Civil Guard, she had committed suicide. However, her husband and three children always insisted that she had been beaten to death by her captors. The eldest son, Florencio, joined his father in the mountains. A year later, on 29th September 1947, a group of guerrilla fighters (around 30, according to witnesses) entered the village, attacked the Civil Guard post and assassinated the previous mayor, Víctor Bayo, and seven members of his family, including two children. The Bayo family were considered responsible for the arrests of Felisa and of other neighbours who supported the guerrillas. In this case, the brutal violence, which is boss in Dos Torres de Mercader, in November 1945. In both cases, oral accounts mention quarrels and conflict with neighbours to add to the political motives of the killings. Archivo Histórico Provincial de Teruel (AHPT), sección Gobierno Civil, caja 1130, carpetas 121, 133 y 136.

without parallel in the roll of anti-Francoist guerrilla actions, was directly related not only to the desire for revenge (both Florencio Guillén, father and son, were directly involved in the action, which took place on the anniversary of Felisa’s death), but also to long-running feuds within the village: Gúdar had been the scene of violent conflict during the civil war, involving the families Bayo and Guillén. Furthermore, Florencio Guillén, had led the management committee during the revolutionary period when the village’s land was collectivized. For this act, he was tried and imprisoned. Later, when on parole, he fled to the mountains and joined the guerrillas. A detailed study by José Ramón Sanchís shows that behind the killings was a tangled web of quarrels and disputes which had deeply divided the community and in which family loyalties were superimposed onto political divisions.46

The wave of violence did not stop here: the murders in Gúdar triggered indiscriminate repression, led personally by the civil governor of the province, General Manuel Pizarro. The authorities arrested 22 people, chosen at random from amongst the local left-wingers in Gúdar and a neighbouring village, who were then killed and buried in a mass grave in the mountains, which was not found and identified until 2006. In response to a brutal act, involving a mixing of political and personal feelings, in which the victims were chosen for their supposed responsibility in the death of Felisa Montolio or for being members of the same family, the regime responded with a much more generalized and indiscriminate type of violence which sought neither justice nor revenge, but to terrorize any potential supporters of the guerrillas.

4. The violence of counterinsurgency

The elements of “brutalization” shown by the violence in Gúdar reflect the new parameters of modern warfare, in which the civilian population plays an important part in mobilization while also becoming a military target. At the start of the 20th century the techniques of occupation and pacification used in colonial wars were introduced to Europe. Franco and his fellow soldiers with experience in North Africa provided a good example of this during the Spanish Civil War.47 The greater involvement of guerrilla groups in the 20th century exacerbated this tendency. Guerrilla warfare is characterized by the ability of the guerrillas to “move like fish through the sea of the people”. This, in turn, resulted in the development of new counterinsurgency techniques which converted the civil population into an important target.48

In Spain, the rural civilian population experienced high levels of repression due to the close ties of the local community with the anti-Francoist guerrillas. According to official records, 19,444 go-betweens and collaborators of the guerrillas were arrested. However, some researchers have suggested that the number of collaborators may have been 60,000 or even 80,000.49 Although the state of emergency officially ended in 1948, in those areas with guerrilla activity it continued until 1951.50 The regime’s official history stated that the war had finished on 1st April 1939, but some rural areas, particularly if they were mountainous, were effectively a war zone for 16 long years. The dictatorship’s violence, carried out by the Civil Guard and the military, had a huge impact which can still be observed today.

50 Marco, States of War, p. 159

In a context which could be defined as undeclared war the show of state violence had a vital role in controlling the population and was intended to destabilize primary links and loyalties. The public exhibiting of dead guerrillas is an image often described in witnesses’ oral accounts. There are also official records and the testimony of former Civil Guards detailing this practice. Manuel Prieto López, a general in the Civil Guard, admitted that he had exhibited the bodies of guerrillas “all too often” when he was a captain in a small village in Málaga. The law required the body to be put on show if unidentified, in order that a neighbour might identify the dead guerrilla. However, Manuel admits that he did the same with all dead guerrillas. The aim of this practice was clearly to spread terror throughout the local community, while acting as a warning to those already collaborating with the guerrillas. However, it occasionally had the opposite effect, causing go-betweens to flee to the mountains.

As a result of this and other repressive policies, hundreds of go-betweens joined the anti-Francoist guerrilla movement. Many were brothers, fathers, cousins or uncles who helped their relatives by providing information, food, infrastructure, etc. However, the women played an even more important part in ensuring the survival of the resistance in Spain. As occurred in similar European movements, the women took advantage of their traditional roles and their “invisibility” to help family, friends, neighbours and comrades in the mountains.\textsuperscript{52} The Civil Guard, as the main agents of repression of the anti-Francoist guerrillas, was aware of the role of women and family in the resistance support networks and did not hesitate to target them. The actions of the two men entrusted with putting an end to the guerrilla forces in Levant and Andalusia, Manuel Pizarro Cenjor and Eulogio Limia Pérez, are worthy of note since they specifically targeted the families of guerrillas.\textsuperscript{53}

---

The Civil Guard and the local authorities tended to attack the economies of the families of the guerrillas. The aim was to break the spirit of resistance within the social networks of the guerrillas while emotionally blackmailing the men in the mountains. The message was simple: the misery and suffering of the family was entirely their fault for joining the guerrilla groups and would only end when they handed themselves in. The authorities employed a variety of tactics. In the case of a family of farm labourers, this was usually to exclude them from their normal tasks in the village. If the family owned a small amount of land or livestock, these were usually targeted by burning crops or farmsteads, cutting down trees and killing the animals.\textsuperscript{54} Property was also confiscated.\textsuperscript{55}

At a higher level on the scale of harassment were the constant arrests, interrogations and imprisonments. The least harrowing was to be under arrest for a few \textsuperscript{53} Yusta, La guerra de los vencidos, pp. 153-161; Sánchez Cervelló, Maquis, pp. 187-229; Marco, Una Corea en pequeño, pp. 15-19.

\textsuperscript{55} Limia Pérez, E. Resumen del problema de bandolerismo en la provincia de Granada. Movimiento Guerrillero. Caja 106. Carpeta 1/3 (AHCCPCE) hours or to have to report to the Civil Guard post every day. At first, these arrests were limited to young men (sons, brothers or cousins of the guerrillas) but were later extended to women and older men. Arrests could lead to interrogations in which the suspects were beaten or tortured. Electric shocks, having the face submerged in water, cigarette burns and beating with vergajos (leather truncheons) were normal practices for the forces of law and order of the dictatorship. This type of interrogation has rarely been reported in official documents, although, exceptionally, an anti-Francoist prisoner described the torture sessions he had experienced to a judge. Nonetheless, the judges never addressed these allegations and the torturers were able to continue their work with total impunity for decades.

Thousands of go-betweens spent years in prison for their collaboration with the guerrilla groups. Giuliana Di Febo reported that “the women’s prisons in Madrid, Córdoba, Málaga and Segovia, especially between 1946 and 1948 (the years of maximum guerrilla activity and reach) were full of women, young and old, serving sentences of 20 or 30 years for giving food to a family member who was a guerrilla”. Many go-betweens spent months in prison without trial, sometimes even after the death of their guerrilla relative. This was the case of the girlfriend, parents and two aunts of Rafael López Álvarez, a member of the Agrupación Guerrillera de Granada. Rafael was caught by the Civil Guard after a tip-off when on the way to visit his girlfriend. A few minutes later, the Civil Guard killed him in front of members of his family, alleging that he was trying to escape. The five relatives were immediately sent to prison in Granada, from which, after a year without trial, they were released without charge.

57 Military Trial 883/486. Archivo del Tribunal Togado Militar nº 23 de Almeria (ATTMA)

The tactic of killing guerrillas and go-betweens and later claiming they had tried to escape was applied systematically by the Civil Guard from 1947 onwards, resulting in the deaths of hundreds of peasants. It came to the fore in the 19th century as a method for combating banditry and is known in Spain as the Ley de Fugas. However, its use by the state peaked in the fight against the anti-Francoist guerrilla movement. In the provinces of Málaga and Granada, the principal proponent of this “dirty war” tactic was Captain Rafael Caballero Ocaña. On 9th March 1947, for example, he arrested three inhabitants of Güejar Sierra (Granada) who were go-betweens for the Clares brothers group. After being tortured in the police station they declared that they knew the whereabouts of some weapons and dynamite which had recently been stolen. The three go-betweens led the Civil Guard to the cave where the material was hidden. Rafael Caballero then ordered that they be shot in accordance with the Ley de Fugas.

Alongside the Ley de Fugas, the Civil Guard employed another counterinsurgency tactic which gravely affected the guerrillas and their go-betweens in the community: the contrapartidas (contraguerrillas). The contrapartidas were paramilitary groups consisting of civil guards and former guerrillas who passed themselves off as real guerrillas. The military commanders gave these groups enormous autonomy and made little effort to control them in order that they might have free rein to spread terror indiscriminately throughout the mountain villages. One function of these groups was 59 The case of Rafael López Álvarez is one of two being investigated by an Argentinian court as crimes against humanity by Franco’s dictatorship: Campelo, P. Dos descendientes de fusilados del franquismo en los años 40 declaran ante la justicia. Público, 27 July 2016.

---

60 Military Trial 496/242 (ATTMA)
61 “Orden Especial nº 3 sobre Servicio de Contrapartidas’, Caja 106, Carpeta 1/1 (AHCCPCE) to carry out operations of persecution and repression of the resistance groups. A. Hernández, a former Civil Guard, admits that they “were ordered to take no prisoners”.62 To encourage more violence in these groups, Civil Guards who did not show sufficient ferocity were punished.63 Another function was to spread psychological warfare amongst the guerrillas’ support networks. The difficulty in distinguishing between real guerrillas and contrapartidas served to spread fear amongst the peasants.64 This tactic seriously reduced the help given to the guerrillas by those in the community as they were afraid of making a mistake and thus giving themselves away.

As we have seen, Franco’s dictatorship deployed a wide range of counterinsurgency techniques against the anti-Francoist guerrillas and these were carried out by both employees of the state and by paramilitaries. The methods of this “dirty war” ranged from torture, imprisonment and extrajudicial killings to economic repression and psychological warfare. Francoist counterinsurgency, widespread and indiscriminate, honed its techniques over the years, achieving greatest success between 1947 and 1949 when the repression was at its height. It was intended not only to engage the armed groups in combat but also to destroy the extensive social support networks that the guerrilla groups had managed to set up through shared political affinities, kinship, friendship and neighbours. The violence and social control imposed by the dictatorship in the countryside throughout the 1940s brought about the demise of the anti-Francoist

---

64 ‘Normas reservadas para la persecución de bandoleros’, Caja 105, Carpeta 3/1 (AHCCPCE); ‘Normas reservadas para la persecución de bandoleros’, Caja 106, Carpeta 1/1 (AHCCPCE) guerrillas in the early 1950s and initiated the rural exodus to the big cities. Here, the peasants could be anonymous while rebuilding their lives.

Conclusions

In comparison with other parts of Europe the number of deaths directly caused by the violence related to the anti-Francoist resistance in post-war Spain would suggest that there was a significantly lower level of violence in Spain than elsewhere. However, to reduce the question to mere figures would not convey the real extent of the violence. Its principal effect, both in the short term and the long term, was to disrupt the solidarity and support networks on which the post-war resistance depended and also the social structure of the rural communities themselves. It is quite possible that the massive rural exodus of the 1950s and 1960s, which depopulated large areas, such as Teruel, was related to the political violence and insecurity experienced during the post-war period. Furthermore, it should be remembered that this violence and the brutalization of social relationships was a prolongation of the civil war of 1936; it was the repression accompanying the coup and the war that caused the chain reaction which led to the formation of armed resistance groups and it was the resolution of the conflict in favour of the authors of the coup that permitted the indiscriminate use of violence by the state against the “dissenting” civilian population.

The principal conclusions of this study relate to the clear differences in the use of violence by the guerrilla groups and the Franco’s dictatorship. The actions of the former were a result of both political and anthropological reasoning: depending on local conflicts and the part played in them by the protagonists, generally guerrilla fighters, the action taken by the guerrilla groups were more or less determined by purely local reasoning, as in the case of revenge in Gúdar. On the other hand, the guerrillas closest to the communist leadership, particularly those in charge, used political and ideological reasoning to direct their actions, which, on occasions such as internal purges, were directed inwards. In contrast to the reduced and selective nature of the resistance movement’s violence and its extreme reactivity to local conflicts, the state’s repressive violence appears selective but massive, directed at a large section of the rural population whose members were broadly classified as ‘reds’ and dangerous ‘enemies of the Fatherland’. There is no doubt of the efficacy of the counterinsurgency strategy: by 1953, the guerrilla movement had virtually disappeared from Spain. The regime had not hesitated to employ techniques of repression involving extreme violence such as mass and extrajudicial killings, against its own people. The pacification of the country, accompanied by extensive anti-communist propaganda achieved recognition of the Francoist regime and readmission to the international community: in 1953 the USA signed several agreements regarding military cooperation with the dictatorship, and, in 1955, Spain was admitted into the United Nations.

---

If the regime was successful in crushing the armed insurrection it was even more successful in promoting the omertà surrounding this period of violence, particularly where state violence was involved. It was not been until the 2000s and the emergence of the “association for the recovery of historical memory” that accounts of the violent Francoist repression of the post-war guerrillas and their collaborators from the community came to light and entered the public domain. For example, the mass grave containing the remains of the peasants executed by the army after the killings in Gúdar was not opened until 2006. To understand the mechanisms of consent and social control employed by the dictatorship to subdue the countryside and eliminate the last vestiges of resistance in the population is to make restitution for the history of this violence in both its state and transnational dimensions: as the definitive consolidation of the crushing of a democratic culture which started with the coup of 1936 and as the triumph of an anti-antifascist strategy validated by the major powers in the profoundly anti-communist context of the Cold War.

66 Varea, R. Entregados los cuerpos de 12 fusilados en Teruel. Público, 31 May 2009. However, it has taken another 10 years for a former guerrilla to speak publicly of internal assassinations within the group: see open letter by Francisco Martínez “el Quico”. Ese pasado que no tiene que caer en el olvido (Carta abierta de un comunista a la dirección de su partido) Eldiario.es, 10 September 2016.